The discovery that could transform Canada’s wine industry

Although Canada is home to internationally award-winning wines, the cold winters and short growing season are a constant challenge. The solution is one that has never been tried with wine grapes before until now: moving production indoors.

And it could change the entire future of Canada’s wine industry, including dramatically expanding organic wine production.

The stable temperatures and environment of indoor production can simulate a natural growing season year round and shorten the amount of time new vines need to come into production.

Languedoc vines suffer ‘worst hail in living memory’

A deluge of hail stones has hit vineyards in one of the most prestigious areas of Languedoc-Roussillon in southern France.

Initial estimates suggest the hail damaged up to 60% of the 2016 crop on average in the area.
